UK borders and migration policy

On the Rwanda policy:

- There will be no removals to Rwanda at least until late autumn after the European Court of Human Rights rejected the government's appeal to unblock the injunction that prevented removals taking place in June. The injunction remains in place until the outcome of the case due at the High Court starting on 5 September that will look at the lawfulness of the policy.
- Concerns over the scheme's lawfulness continue to be raised by the Joint Committee on Human Rights.
- Meanwhile, Liz Truss has indicated she would seek to expand on the UK-Rwanda partnership by facilitating partnerships with more countries to act as offshoring locations, should she be elected as Prime Minister.

Arrivals via small boats continue to break records with nearly 700 people crossing the Channel in one day last week, the highest total in 2022. (Source: Independent)

There's been media coverage of immigration problems experienced by athletes at the Commonwealth games in Birmingham. Some Gambian sprinters missed the competition as a result of visa delays. (Source: BBC)

This legal article explains the impact of the Bill of Rights on immigration cases. Much focus is on how the Bill will seek to facilitate removals previously blocked on the grounds of family and private life, but the author is sceptical about whether or not that was ever really an issue. Yearly account reports show that in the last financial year the Home Office paid out over £40 million in compensation (including Windrush and people wrongfully detained) and nearly £30 million on legal costs for cases it lost. (Source: the Guardian)

Specific migrant groups

Lord Harrington, the Minister for Refugees called on councils to do more to help accommodate Afghan refugees. Over 10,000 resettled Afghans are currently accommodation in hotels whilst awaiting social housing, including in Yorkshire and Humber, while more are expected to be resettled to the UK in coming months. Some Afghan families have been separated due to a shortage of hotel spaces, following the cancellation of hotel contracts and the inability to find long-term accommodation for them. This article explores how differing schemes result in differential treatment of refugees, highlighting the differences between the Ukraine and Afghan schemes. (Source: BBC)

Charities and local groups organising matches between hosts and Ukrainian guests warn they face a shortage of hosts, despite many people registering with the official Homes for Ukraine scheme. (Source: Politics Home)

On modern slavery, two groups have been highlighted recently as particularly vulnerable:

- People in the asylum system are at risk of modern slavery, according to a report from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and the British Red Cross; they recommend some ways in which to reduce that risk.
- Research conducted by peer researchers highlights the vulnerability of migrant live-in care workers to modern slavery.
